Townscape with mixed architectural styles : Hirairi and Tsumairi*

The unique feature of the townscape in Asuke is the rows of houses along the main road that have mixed architectural styles. The styles of houses are often decided by the size and shape of the housing site. Tsumairi style is often chosen when the width of the site is less than 5 ken (1ken=1.8m) and quite deep. With increasing demand for properties for business use, some warehouses were converted into homes or stores.

The main architectural style of houses in Asuke is two-storied Hirairi, with a tall second floor. Together with the outer walls finished with white plaster, it creates a stately atmosphere.

The splendid roof trusses were made from the rich resources of wood in the area, using highly skilled local craftsmen.

Omoya (Main building) in Shikorobuki style

Omoya (main building) with low eaves and layered roofs, where there's a small gap in between the upper and the lower (Shikorobuki style roof), still remains in Asuke today. Some of these buildings are said to take over the styles of buildings before the great fire of 1775.

Stone Wall, Stone Stairs, and a Row of Houses Along the River

Along the Asuke River are stone walls and staircases, the stones of which were first stacked at the end of the Edo Period (1603-1867) until early modern period. Above, Zashiki (guest rooms) and other buildings were built overhanging the river. All of these elements combine to create a wonderful riverside atmosphere.

Alleys Beside the main road

Storehouses and stonewalls stand side by side, right up to the boundary of each property. The alley beside the main road, commanding the mountains behind it, creates a different ambience from the townscape along the main road.

Plaster coated walls and Shitamita (wood sidings) give a historical feeling.
